TEXT MARKUP

- When creating a web page, you add tags (known as markup) to the contents of the page.
 - These tags provide extra meaning and allow browsers to show users the appropriate structure for the page.
 - Structural markup: the elements that you can use to describe both headings and paragraphs
 - Semantic markup: are text elements that are not affect the structure of your web pages, but they do add extra information to the pages

HTML LIST

- A vertical bar on the left side of the slide consisting of six colored dots: blue, cyan, green, yellow, red, and pink.
- There are lots of cases when we need to use lists. HTML provides us with three different types:
 - Ordered lists are lists where each item in the list is numbered.
 - For example, the list might be a set of steps for a recipe that must be performed in order
 - Unordered lists are lists that begin with a bullet point (rather than characters that indicate order).
 - Definition lists are made up of a set of terms along with the definitions for each of those terms.

SUMMARY

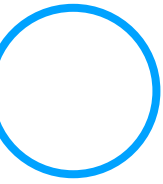

There are three types of HTML lists: ordered, unordered, and definition.

Ordered lists use numbers.

Unordered lists use bullets.

Definition lists are used to define terminology.

Lists can be nested inside one another.
